While old and wise heads of the Unite-states and England are carrying on a dig diffed quarrel over the ownership of the sea n Behring Sea, let me tell you somethin.

in Behring Sea, let me tell you something about royal itsb.

You know that kings and queens have many rights and prerogatives. Well, one of these perrogatives of Loglish rulers in olden times related to royal rish. Royal fish are sturgeon and whale, which are considered the finest of deep-sea fish. For this reason, "on account of their superior excellence," whenever one of these fish was thrown ashore or caught near the coast of England it became the property of the king. This seems very unjust to those whe might secure the whale or sturgeon; for they were compelled to give it up without receiving any pay. However, the king has some ground for claiming those royal fish as his property, because it was he whe guarded and protected the seas from pirates and robbers, and in those days there were very many of them.

The most pseudiar feature of the custom or royal fish was this—that while the whole of the sturgeon belonged to the king, only had of a whale did. For it was a prerogative, at it is called, of the Queen that the tail of every whale caught in the way I have tok you was her property, while the head only was the kings. The retween for this diving the light.

This right to royal fish was considered

THELAUREL BRIGADE'S REUNION.

A Pen sketch of Some of Its Most Distinguished Members.

Many an old Confederate soldier scattered throughout the land is looking forward with more than ordinary pleasure to the first of October, writes an "Old Confederate" in the Roanoke Times. On that day there is to be a reunion. At Winchester, dear old town, where a hungry soldier was never tirned away, and where the fair hands of the fairest women of the land ministered to the wants of the sick and wounded, the old brigade is to meet. Away back in the dark autumnal days of 1804, when our "grapes were of iron and our vintage was of blood," General Lee, or "Marse Robert," as the boys delighted to call him, ordered that each cavalry brigade should have a special mane and cach man should wear a badge indicative of the name.

At that time Rosser's had been doing much good service, and around them clustered a halo of glory, and to them was given the title of Laurel Brigade, a title they no bly bore until the furling of the flag at Appointatox.

General Tom Rosser is living near Charlottesville. Having amassed a competence, he enjoys life, and is proud of having commanded this old Laurel.
